Individual reflection William Schmitz – Week 2

This week the team has made good progress using scrum as a way of working. Coming up with the correct Epics on our Trello board was quite hard, I think. Throughout the week we seemed to go back and forth between different epics and finally decided on a set. Through good communication and discussion in the group which I participated in we worked it out. The other hard part was coming up with good user stories that sufficiently included all aspects of the Epics. Since we still haven't really started working on the project this was still quite vague and I believe we will have to come back and revise or add some user stories later. For me I feel that I've learnt more about Scrum after this week but I still want to learn more about creating good user stories since this was the hardest part this week for me. After the lecture on Wednesday and the exercise "slice the cake" I felt that I was more comfortable than before but still not enough.

I am one of the three people in our team that has the knowledge how to create a database, and this will be one of my upcoming tasks the coming weeks. This will therefore, for now, be my deliverable the coming weeks. The others seem to have more knowledge about other aspects of the tasks and an information exchange will probably happen between the members since we want everyone to be on the same page.

I made my contribution for the business model canvas and the description of our project through writing, creating and discussing with the group.

Till next week I want to:

- Learn more about scrum and creating good user stories
- Be done with creating all User stories for all the epics we have
- Start working on the database and hopefully be done with our first Epic.
- Be done with our user story 2.1 to create a local server on my computer and we able to see "hello world" when I navigate to localhost:xxxx.
- Started working on the domain for the database
